Biography

Born in Baltimore on December 29, 1779, John McDonogh was the son of John McDonogh, Sr. and Elizabeth Wilkins. As a young man, McDonogh traveled to New Orleans at the behest of his employer. He settled in the city and soon went into business for himself, successfully building upon his early gains by purchasing and letting land. It was rumored at the time of his death that he had the largest portfolio of land in the United States. His tactics were not always considered ethical and landed both him and eventually his estate in court multiple times.

In addition to owning land, McDonogh also owned a number of slaves. A devout Presbyterian, he was a member of the American Colonization Society. The objective of the society was to encourage and facilitate black emigration from America to what is now the country of Liberia. Instead of freeing his slaves outright, McDonogh devised a scheme wherein an enslaved person could "earn" his freedom by working on Saturdays instead of enjoying the day off. Though it would take about fifteen years, a number of individuals did manage to complete this plan to McDonogh's approval, at which point he sent them with tools, money, and supplies off to Liberia. He also sent two of his slaves, David and Washington, to Lafayette College in Pennsylvania with the intent of them then heading to Liberia as educated men and preachers. Despite these measures, McDonogh did not stop purchasing or selling slaves, and he only granted them unconditional freedom upon his death.

McDonogh never married. During his lifetime, he was regarded as a miser who only spent money to make more money. When he died on October 26, 1850, it came as a surprise to many that McDonogh had left almost his entire fortune to be split jointly between the cities of New Orleans and Baltimore for the purpose of educating children. His only surviving sibling, Mary, was given $3,000.

The will was immediately contested by various parties— Mary and her children, fake relatives, people who felt McDonogh had stolen their land during his life—and the case between Mary and the cities of New Orleans and Baltimore eventually made it to the United States Supreme Court, which ruled in favor of the cities. New Orleans used its money to establish and fund thirty—five schools over several decades before spending the last of the fund to restore McDonogh's grave in 2012. In Baltimore, the money was put into a trust and eventually used to open a single school, McDonogh School, in 1873. Both the schoolchildren in New Orleans and Baltimore honored McDonogh on his birthday per his request, with "McDonogh Day" eventually becoming an annual event of note in New Orleans. However, his request that the schools be open to boys of any ethnicity was ignored in both cities until the 1960s.

While he was praised for decades for his incredible act of philanthropy, his legacy as a slaveholder has led to a reevaluation of McDonogh over the last few decades. Several of the remaining "McDonogh Schools" in New Orleans have replaced his name with that of a notable African—American, and McDonogh School in Owings Mills has erected a memorial to those people who were enslaved by him at any point in their lives. In the summer of 2020, amid the Black Lives Matters protests and actions nationally, two of the public monuments to McDonogh were vandalized and knocked off their pillars. The city of New Orleans has yet to restore them.

Scope and Content Notes

This is an artificial collection that was largely assembled by McDonogh's first archivist Frayda Salkin. It includes some of Salkin's correspondence with individuals in Louisiana, as well as photos of McDonogh–related sites from her 1996 trip to New Orleans. Salkin also printed out a number of historic articles on John McDonogh using her personal subscription to a genealogy and history database. Most of these articles are from the Baltimore Sun or the Times Picayune newspaper of New Orleans.

The collection contains information on John McDonogh's family, his slaves, his will and the legal contests to it, the McDonogh schools of New Orleans and Baltimore, and his enduring legacy in both cities. There are many photographs and DVDs of "McDonogh Day" in New Orleans, as well as photos of monuments and paintings of McDonogh. Additionally, there are a number of copies of theses on McDonogh or the McDonogh schools in New Orleans.
